

Being a Leader

A leader is a person who guides and helps others. Good leaders listen to people, make decisions, and give support. They care about their team and always try to do what is right. Many people think that leadership is only for managers or presidents, but everyone can be a leader in life.

Right now, many young people are learning how to be leaders in their schools. They are organizing events, helping classmates, and speaking in front of groups. Some are starting small projects to help their community. They are working hard, and they are making a difference.

In the past, I had a teacher who inspired me a lot. She always encouraged us to try new things. She gave us advice and taught us to be confident. I remember one time when we worked together on a school project. She showed us how to plan and how to work as a team. That experience changed the way I saw leadership.

When I was younger, I used to be shy. I didn't speak in public, and I used to avoid group work. I also used to think that leaders were born, not made. But over time, I learned that leadership is a skill you can develop. I started to practice speaking in front of others, and I began to help more in group activities. Now I understand that anyone can be a leader if they try.

Leadership is about action, respect, and responsibility. It is about helping others and making good choices every day.

Discussion questions:

1. In your opinion, what three qualities are most important for a good leader to have?
2. Can you describe a time when someone showed leadership in your school or community? What did they do?
3. Think about a leader you admire. How do they help and support other people?
4. How can students show leadership in everyday situations at school or at home?
5. What is one leadership skill you would like to improve, and how can you start working on it?
